from the board chair

Dear Friends and Supporters of the Chinook Fund,

The past year has presented the Chinook community with the occasion for celebration, the growth that comes from change, and the excitement of new opportunities.

This year the Chinook Fund celebrated 20 years of strengthening movements, promoting social justice, and activist-led grant making in Colorado. Thanks to the wonderful efforts of staff, volunteers, and community members, the Seeds of Justice: 20th Anniversary Conference & Celebration was a great success. The event provided opportunities for collaboration, education, and reflection to a wide and critical audience. The Chinook Fund was truly honored by the number of founding donors, early grantees, and past staff members who took part in this wonderful celebration.

This year brought growth and learning with the departure of the Fund's Executive Director, Sherelle Hessell. Though headed our separate ways, we value and appreciate the time, energy and effort that Sherelle gave as a leader to the Chinook Fund, and to the community at large. We hope you will join us in wishing Sherelle the absolute best in her future endeavors.

Change brought the opportunity to take a closer look at the Fund's management structure and internal process. With leadership provided by Victoria Gómez, Neha Mahajan, and Katie Thiede, and support from community members, the Chinook Fund has decided to embrace a collective leadership model. Rather than a single executive director, Chinook will be led by a leadership team consisting of three positions: a Director of Business and Finance, a Director of Programs and Education, and a Director of Resource Development. This is a very exciting opportunity for Chinook and we ask that you join us in supporting Victoria, Neha, and Katie as they provide new and enthusiastic leadership for our community.

Volunteering with Chinook continues to be an exceptional privilege that I deeply cherish. As much as the Chinook Fund is dedicated to promoting social justice and freedom from oppression through its programs and grant making, it also provides collateral gifts. Perhaps the most significant of these gifts is the growth and development of volunteers, donors and staff. Like other volunteers, being a part of Chinook has given me the opportunity to advance my understanding of privilege and oppression, as well as what it really takes to engage in social justice work that impacts communities. I am continually humbled by the patience, support, and caring that Chinook activists, advocates, and community leaders provide to me and other volunteers.

To all you past, present, and prospective supporters of Chinook, I urge you to get involved, volunteer, donate, and encourage others. The Colorado community needs organizations like Chinook that fearlessly fight for social justice.

Peace,

Jesse King

20 years at a glance...

1987

Chinook Fund is founded by a group of progressive philanthropists seeking to channel resources into social justice groups and movements in Colorado.

1995

Chinook purchases the building it had been leasing, establishing its presence in the northwest neighborhoods of Denver and acquiring a vital asset.

1988

The first activist-controlled grantmaking takes place, pioneering an effort to transfer funding decisions to grassroots community leaders and organizers. Fifty thousand dollars in Chinook grants are distributed for the first time this year.

1998

The “Building a Foundation for Justice” skills training and gathering marks the 10th year anniversary of the Fund. Many progressive organizations who once received seed funding from the Chinook Fund begin to show proof of their deepening impact on Colorado’s social justice landscape.

Figures include technical assistance, critical response, regular and special grant awards

Chinook Fund Social Justice Institute Participants

2000

Chinook supporters and friends gather for the “Roast of John Hickenlooper,” honoring the leadership of one of Chinook’s most prominent founders. The Fund also reaches the one million mark in grants awarded.

2002

The People’s Fund guides the first internal anti-oppression effort for Chinook through the “Undoing Racism Retreat.” This step institutionalizes Chinook’s commitment to looking at race, gender, sexual orientation, class, ableism and other oppressions within the organization in subsequent years.

2003

For the first time, Chinook offers political education training to residents of low-income Denver neighborhoods through its Social Justice Institute.

2005

The Board of Directors adopts a new mission statement, which currently guides Chinook’s unique role as funder in Colorado.

Furthermore, this year Chinook begins to formally offer anti-oppression consulting to local nonprofits through the Social Justice Awareness module.

2008

The “Seeds of Justice” conference and celebration marks the 20th year anniversary of the Chinook Fund, further establishing the longevity of the organization and its impact on movement building.

This year Chinook surpasses the 2 million mark in grants awarded to groups working for social justice across the state.

Additionally, the investment of trustees and staff delivers the Fund’s first collective leadership model to align its operations more closely with its values.

types of grants

Established Grants support groups with a demonstrated ability to do social change work that 1) is led by the constituents most affected by the issue, 2) reflects the diversity of their community and 3) creates lasting systemic change. Grants up to $10,000 are awarded.

Start-up Grants support new groups, less than four years old, with the potential to create effective social change. Grants up to $4,000 are awarded.

Critical Response Grants of up to $1,000 enable groups to respond to unforeseen or developing public events. These funds are not meant to alleviate financial difficulties.

Technical Assistance Grants of up to $1,000 supports organizational development and growth for grantees.

our grantmaking

As a foundation, the Chinook Fund stands out in the types of organizations it funds. We often work with groups that are too new, too risky or too radical to receive funding from more mainstream sources. Our grantees fight to alter social/economic relationships and institutions which are unjust, inequitable and undemocratic.

Our grantmaking process is also unique. Rather than have staff and donors exclusively determine how money is given out, the Chinook Fund gives decision-making power to community activists who have worked on the ground for social change. Our grantmaking committee reflects the diversity of the communities we fund and uses consensus to give weight to every voice in the process.

With these practices, the Chinook Fund strives to be increasingly accountable to progressive movements and the communities our grantees work in.

the future we are creating

As the year 2008 draws to a close, the Chinook Fund stands at a crossroads between a twenty-year legacy of supporting social change and a new vision of organizational transformation. This direction is both rooted in Chinook's historical mission and fresh with creative energy. It is stepping back to leap further.

At this pivotal time, we are using wisdom gained during Chinook's tenure to help us move forward. The past year has presented the challenge of transition along with the opportunity for growth that comes with new staff leadership. Through these changes, Chinook has embarked on an introspective journey that has birthed a new model for collective leadership.

This model calls for a non-hierarchical structure in which co-directors share responsibilities and accountability to board members, volunteers, activists, donors and grantees who make up the Chinook community. In exploring this approach, we are re-engaging communities in organic and participatory processes. We are also offering one sustainable solution to complex shifts in the philanthropic sector.

At a time of financial scarcity, innovation leads the way. In response to the challenge, Chinook is investing in inter-dependence and collective intelligence to advance its work. The co-leadership model honors Chinook's progressive spirit by promoting the sharing of power. It pays tribute to collective ways of operating in the lineages, cultures and communities that sustain us, while responsibly employing the organization's resources.

Chinook is moving forward with a renewed commitment to movement building, internal anti-oppression work, social justice training, and activist-led grantmaking that continues to impact the political landscape of Colorado. Through it all, we remain inspired and humbled by the passion and commitment of our grantees who fight for change against all odds.

We continue to pursue the systemic change that makes a just, equitable and free society possible. Our communities, our voices, are needed for this effort. We invite you to take part in this transformation and help us shape the future.

In Solidarity,

Victoria Gómez
